During the 1950s [an] extraordinary group of intellectuals entered social science and helped to remake both it and the larger social world. Though they were exceptional individuals, they were also the products of impressive social institutions. One of the most important was Antioch College, and it is on this formative environment for courage as well as creativity that the scholars writing in this book reflect. Their essays are telling and stimulating. They should be assigned to all undergraduates considering careers in social science, and they will repay the attention of graduate students and professors.

Craig Calhoun, President
Social Science Research Council scholarship and hold or held prestigious positions at some of the best schools in the United States and abroad.

These six contributors came together on October 24, 2003 at Antioch College as representatives of the post-World War II period when Antioch was a nebula that fashioned intellectual, cultural, and political stars. They reflected on their personal backgrounds, their scholarship, and the role that Antioch College had in building on the first and training for the second.

In these pages, they speak to an element of the social sciences often ignored—courage. They address the place of values in social science, the challenges they addressed in their careers, and the challenge for future social scientists and their students to continue interdisciplinary, problem-centered, relevant, and rigorous social analysis.

Contributors: David Apter, Cynthia Epstein, Heinz Eulau, Gordon Fellman, Fred Greenstein, Allan Pred and Joan Straumanis

Richard Couto is a founding faculty member of the Antioch Ph.D. Leadership and Change program.
Antioch’s interdisciplinary approach to the social sciences at mid-century was remarkable. Knowledge was to be "constructed" not "learned." Collaboration was encouraged. Everyone was expected to do outstanding work. Social goals and values were central to all of the discussions. These chapters and the remarkable careers of the authors illustrate the extraordinary power of this educational approach.

Mary Field Belenky
Co-author of Women’s Ways of Knowing and A Tradition that Has No Name.

For further information contact
Richard A. Couto rcouto@phd.antioch.edu 804.304.8178
For order information see http://www2.xlibris.com/bookstore/bookdisplay.asp?bookid=26966
Antioch College is a private, independent nonprofit liberal arts institution. Courses for Credit & Audit earn college credits or just learn more about a subject that interests you during Antioch College’s summer and mid-winter block terms. Courses are open to high school juniors and seniors, students enrolled at other colleges and universities, and the general public. Antioch College is a platform where students launch themselves down a path of self-directed study, engaging in academics and real-world experiences. By taking charge of their learning and engaging in interdisciplinary study, Antioch’s Self-Designed Major program supported by signature courses and personal faculty mentoring positions students to win victories for humanity in the twenty-first century. Courses in Courage: Antioch College And the Social Sciences. June 8, 2005, Xlibris Corporation. Paperback in English. Not in Library. Add another edition? Courses in Courage. First published in 2005. Environmental Science. Mathematics. Social Sciences. Anthropology. Political Economy. Antioch College is within walking distance of downtown Yellow Springs. The Village is nationally known as a vibrant arts community, recognized as one of America’s Most Fun Small Towns (Rand McNally/USA Today), one of America’s 10 Coolest Small Towns (Budget Travel), and Best Ohio Hometown (Ohio Magazine). Antioch College alumni are scattered around the world. No matter where their lives have led them, they are prepared for lives of significance and service, whether they choose to pursue graduate education or embark directly on a career. Courses in Courage book. Read reviews from the world’s largest community for readers. During the 1950s an extraordinary group of intellectuals entered social... Craig Calhoun, President, Social Science Research Council Antioch’s interdisciplinary approach to the social sciences at mid-century was remarkable. Knowledge was to be “constructed” not “learned.” Collaboration was encouraged. Everyone was expected to do outstanding work. Social goals and values were central to all of the discussions. These papers and the remarkable careers of the authors illustrate the extraordinary power of this educational approach.