REGULAR ARTICLE Forensic Psychiatry and the Internet: Practical Perspectives on Sexual Predators and Obsessional Harassers in Cyberspace Michael G. McGrath, MD, and Eoghan Casey, MA The growth of the Internet has revolutionized how society conducts business in many areas. Not to be left behind, the sexual predator and the obsessional harasser have found cyberspace to be a vehicle capable of meeting their needs: obtaining information, monitoring and contacting victims, developing fantasy, overcoming inhibitions, avoiding apprehension, and communicating with other offenders. Although clearly disparate offender categories, these two groups are included in this article because of the likelihood of their using the Internet in pursuit of their goals. Forensic psychiatrists should become familiar with computers and the Internet so that they can conduct relevant psychiatric evaluations of such individuals and can advise attorneys, victims, and law enforcement personnel competently, when retained in that capacity. This article discusses the Internet and its use by the sexual predator and the obsessional harasser, highlighting information of interest to the forensic psychiatrist, including the poorly understood field of digital evidence. Aspects of the Internet, such as on-line dating and cybersex also are covered, because they relate to sexual predation and stalking. The Rise of the South African Reich

by Brian Bunting

Preface

The Rise of the South African Reich, first published by Penguin Africa Library in 1964 and revised in 1969, analyses the period in which the political foundations of the apartheid regime were laid.

It traces the mobilisation of Nationalist Party power in the 1930s and 1940s around an ideology which had close affinities with that of Nazism. It documents the steps by which the Nationalist Party, having become the ruling party in 1948, consolidated its power: control of the trade unions, banning of mass political organisations, control of education and censorship of ideas, and the building of a massive armed machinery of repression.

After the writing of the book the apartheid regime shifted its social base, greatly expanded its repressive capacity and introduced new elements in its strategy for maintaining minority control. The political map of Southern Africa was redrawn by the advancing forces of liberation.

The book was written in the 1960s, a period which many observers labelled as one of 'political quiescence'. Bunting, however makes clear in his account of the regime's preparations for the defence of apartheid by military means, that the mass political mobilisation which later threatened the regime was built on an unbroken history of resistance.

Baillie of the South African Police defended the members of his force against these allegations, but admitted that when he forced his way into Voortrekker Building, the O.B. headquarters, he had found the place filled with armed men from top to basement. 'There were weapons of every description - sticks, lead piping, batons, sjamboks, and so on.' While South Africa remained relatively unharmed by the Weltkrieg besides a short campaign into South West Africa and a short lived Maritz rebellion, winds of change arrived when Louis Botha, South Africa's first prime minister, died in office. Deputy prime minister Jan Christian Smuts then became the second Prime minister of the union, and, one month later, was forced to call for elections after a barrage of criticism from the Boer community. The election resulted in a hung parliament with the National Party winning the most seats. Smuts' South African Party then decided to form a coalition wi The Rise of the South African Reich. From the former lands of Russia where petty warlords battle for control of the torched steppes, to the once mighty Reich, where various factions threaten to tear the nation apart into civil war. No matter what happens, the world is in perhaps its most turbulent phase, with the Reich and Japan on the brink of war, and the threat of nuclear destruction looming over all, will the world survive into the 70’s?  But as for the Second South African Civil War, basically SALF is where most of Kapa Bokone is, with Carnavon being in the southern part of Kapa Bokone, the SACW 2 Republic of South Africa is in Western Cape where Dommes is on the map, the Zhulu-Khosa Alliance is where most of the Durban Socialist Republic is, the Boer Republic controls all.
